One of these is the program called MediaConvert. The problem with this program, though, is that it costs $59 for a lifetime license which illustrates its usefulness in professional use cases only. This leaves you with few good choices when it comes to converting videos to mp3s without paying an outrageous price for a single license. However, there are some alternatives out there which provide similar services for free or almost free. We will cover several of these programs, but first, let's take a look at what you need to know about converting videos. Why Convert Videos to Mp3s? Most people want to convert videos to mp3s because they can store more songs on their mp3 players than music DVDs can hold. This is because the amount of data that one mp3 takes up doesn't compare with that which one music DVD or CD can hold. The main problem with mp3s, however, is that they are not recognized by most music players. This means that you will need to convert videos to mp3s in order for the songs to work on your portable audio player. For example, if you have a Toshiba audio player then you cannot just drag and drop a video from your computer into the Toshiba audio player, instead, you must convert the video first. Video Converter vs Video Converter Software It's rare for three completely different programs to provide the exact same feature set and none of them have any drawbacks either. However, sometimes different programs manage to provide very similar features while coming up short in one area or another. This is why we'll be taking a look at our first program and then we'll move on to the others. Video Conversion with VLC Now we'll take a look at how you can convert videos with VLC for free or nearly free.
